

Better apartment, or better product?

"I agree it's a better apartment. I just don't think the market will pay for it."

suf Zen · Realization

The better apartment on the table

After the plot lost part of its buildable area, our architect proposed merging a small studio and a one-bedroom at the rear into one generous T2 with its own patio.

As architecture, it was the right call.

Two easy sales, or one hard one

As a product, the merge turned two easy sales into one hard one. So we kept two registered units: one buyer can use them as one home, or as two.

Two easy sales, not one hard one

One generous T2

As a home

the better apartment

As a sale

a big ticket, a hard sale

For one buyer

a single home

Two registered units

As a home

a studio and a one-bedroom

As a sale

two easy sales

For one buyer

one home, or two

One buyer, two units: live as one, or rent as two.

Balconies go before the interior

When a site loses area, give up the balconies first. Smaller units keep the price range adjustable, even at a higher price per metre, and a cramped one may need height, not width.

And the rear stair? We're making it a feature.

The better apartment is one conversation, what the market can buy is the other, and a project needs both.

Working through a unit mix right now? I'm happy to compare notes.

