Not a feud.

A share too small to call about.

Nobody is fighting. Nobody has a reason to start.

Suf Zen · Realization

One house, every heir must agree

While an inheritance is undivided (herança indivisa), the heirs act together. To sell one house, every one of them has to say yes.

> With two siblings, easy. With twelve cousins, less so.

Small shares, no reason to organise

When your slice is tiny, gathering everyone costs more than your say is worth. So nobody starts, and the house waits.

> The most extreme case I've seen: 120+ heirs in one building.

Give every share a reason to answer

01
Tiny share
no reason to act

02
Clear picture
what it could become

03
Real offer
a number to answer

04
A decision
yes, no or counter

> A sliver stays silent until there is something concrete to answer.

The usual case is smaller

Up to five heirs, and often one who lacks the time, the knowledge or the money to move things along. Start there.

Give every share a reason to answer, and the house starts to move.

Take it, send it to your co-heirs, and tell me what happened.
